

THE TWIN BROTHERS FINCH.

ONE OF THE WESTPORT CONSTABLES VERY BADLY PERVERSED.

But Westport's Court set at All in Doubt as to its Duty. First, it left on the Edge over the Saugatuck, and Who Did It.

Westport, Conn., Dec. 13.—A few days ago, Constable Gorman, who tends the drawbridge over the Saugatuck River, saw a man drive over the bridge on a smart trot. This was a clear violation of the law. A notice in green block letters, at each entrance to the bridge, warns drivers against allowing horses to go over at a pace faster than a walk, and reminds them that a violation of the law will result in punishment. This man, whom the constable saw violating the law, had a long sandy beard, a moustache that hid his mouth, and was a portly person. The horse the constable recognized. It belonged to the Finch brothers, and the man was one of the brothers, but there was no telling which one. The constable, however, made a complaint, and took the chances of complaining against the offending brother. Men in Norwalk who have known the Finch brothers for years say that they cannot be identified one from the other. When one of them is seen with a portly air, the other is seen. These account of the Finch brothers.¹ "When they are not, as is frequently the case, together, people say, 'There are the Finch boys.'

They are heavily bearded men, and their beards are so much alike that it is difficult to tell which is the other, and the man which is as tawny as a bear's mane, is identical. There are the same blue eyes and shaggy eyebrows, the same prominent cheek bones, and the same portly figure. They are said to be exactly alike in size, fullness of the lips and expression, but no one can say that positively now. Their manner of driving their carriage is the same. It is said that the weight the same number of pounds and good weight it is—more than 400 pounds altogether. The persons who know them best are entirely at a loss. Since childhood the Finch brothers have dressed precisely alike. They put off their winter clothing and put on their summer garments in pairs. One garment, such as a coat, alike are bought and used at the same time. If one of the Finch brothers loses a button and has a new one put on, the other does not notice it until a button like his brother's is sewn on his garment.

They are inscribed, but their family live in these parts, and the Finch brothers have their own property it is said in common, and they are reported well off.

The Finch brothers are twins, and have always been considered alike, as much for their extreme fondness for each other, their opinions of taste, sympathy, and character, as for their resemblance in looks.

It was thought, therefore, when Constable Gorman made his complaint to Justice Finch—no relative of the brothers—but the perplexing question was, which twin?

On the day appointed for the hearing Justice Finch sat in his office. Constable Gorman was there to prove his offense. The door opened and the two brothers entered.

"There is a charge against one of the Finch brothers," said the Justice, "of violating the laws of the State."

"The Finch brothers have driving over the Saugatuck, and that driving has been causing trouble to the public."

"It is said that the man who did not hit you is the twin."

"Well, he said that you said that when you hit me you smash him in the nose."
